be detailed, since you will be extremely stressed and will likely forget what should be done. Include a list of things to take, their exact location in the house, and possibly even a map. I've divided my plan into two groups.

1. Grab and go

This plan is for those situations when you must leave or go to a certain area of the house immediately and can only take what can be carried with two hands. In these cases, there isn't much warning, like a tornado.

I have only two items on this plan's list. My laptop and one file folder. The file folder contains genealogy material and important items, such as insurance papers, credit card information, bank accounts numbers and copies of personal vital records.

2. Watch and Wait

This plan is for those situations that might give several hours or days warning, such as a wildfire or flood. With more time, you will be able to take what fits in your car or truck.

Copies of the disaster plan should be kept in several locations of the house, preferably one on each floor. They should be easily accessible and all members of the family should know where they are kept.

Practice the plan to make sure it works. Update and review the plan at least yearly.

Of course, personal safety should always come before material items. But if there is time to protect your family history, having a well thought-out plan of action will preserve your genealogy legacy for many generations.

If you would like a sample of a genealogy disaster plan, I'd be happy to share it with you.
